The Lighthouse Keeper

When the old keeper retired after forty-one years, the lighthouse went dark for the first time. Nobody in the village knew how to light the lamp.

His granddaughter came back from the city. She had counted the stairs as a child, and she remembered every step. On the third evening the light was burning over the sea again.

The village held a small party on the harbour. Everyone agreed that the light had never looked brighter than it did that night.